The process typically begins with gathering oral histories and family documents such as birth certificates, marriage licenses, wills, and letters. From there, researchers access public archives, church records, census data, and historical registries. Digitization of records has facilitated easier access and integration of disparate data sources.

Genealogical Software and Databases

Modern genealogists utilize specialized software to organize information and visualize pedigrees. These tools allow for the creation of detailed family trees with notes, sources, and media attachments. Online databases, such as national archives and specialized genealogical websites, provide vast repositories of records that can be searched and linked.
