When to Visit San Juan, Puerto Rico

Choosing the right time to visit San Juan, Puerto Rico, can significantly enhance your travel experience. The island enjoys a tropical climate year-round, but there are distinct seasons that may influence your decision. The peak tourist season generally runs from mid-December to mid-April, coinciding with drier weather and cooler temperatures. During these months, you can expect sunny days and pleasant evenings, making it ideal for exploring the historic sites and enjoying the beaches. However, this is also when prices for accommodations and flights tend to be higher, and attractions can be more crowded. The shoulder seasons, from April to June and from September to November, offer a fantastic balance of good weather and fewer crowds, often with more affordable travel options. These periods still provide excellent conditions for sightseeing and outdoor activities, with a lower chance of encountering major hurricanes. The low season, from June to August, is characterized by hotter and more humid weather, with a higher likelihood of afternoon showers. While this period might be less ideal for those sensitive to heat, it offers the most budget-friendly travel opportunities and a more relaxed atmosphere.

Peak Tourist Season in San Juan

The months between December and April are considered the prime time to visit San Juan, Puerto Rico. This period is characterized by its delightful weather, with consistently sunny skies, low humidity, and comfortable temperatures, averaging in the mid-80s Fahrenheit.
